Clarence Darrow
Clarence Darrow is dead.
Probably the most famous defender of criminals and the cause of the labor unions, he was a colorful figure, usually in large clothes, and keeping himself within reach of the highest and the lowest.

Among his first big jumps to national prominence was his famous defense of Leo Frank, the Atlanta Negro laborer in the Georgia shoe factory case, in which he served in a leading role.

While Darrow handled many big cases, including the Sacco and Vanzetti trial in Boston, he was equally well-known for his outlook upon life, much of which he expressed publicly after he was looked toward for public appearances. He died from cancer.

And he's not the only one — only all not the lawyers are lawyers, nor are they all dead.

It is said to be the "Three R's of Bicycling as "Regulation, Education, and Protection."

Registration, says the group, develops in the rider a sense of responsibility and an observance of proper laws; recreation, will be obtainable through registration and the need of the cyclist is always a need and along boulevards and parks,
