A Million Leaders Needed

In times of stress and crisis, leadership is everything.

The U. S. needs leadership—not the leadership—of one several European countries have turned, tired and beaten by struggle and complexity—but leadership in every field. It is no longer enough for any man to be a leader simply in his own field—the leader of today must see the relationship of his special field to the whole, and act according ligly.

Nobody ever accused James Truslow Adams of being a Nibody ever accused James Truslow Adams of being a Nibody and Indical. He is a conservative business man turned historian. Yet he believes that the American scheme of things as living men have known it is now being given its last chance.

as living men have known it is now being given its last chance. In a recent article in "Barron's," Adams appeals to business men to show themselves again capable of the leadership which once made them the heroes of America. He sees a turn to the business man from the politician, especially since the defense drive has put so great a premium on efficiency. These factors, he feels, have "given the business leaders a new chance, and perhaps their last, to prove their value to the great society and to provide for it that leadership and service without which no class can permanently survive..."

Business leaders must realize, Adams warns, that today a high business position, as has been said of public office, is a public trust and not merely a well-paid job." Business men Ilke Knudsen and Stettinius, who have given up well-paying jobs to help their country are merely one example. Adams says; every business man must now devote part of his time, energy, and thought to the general welfare, for it is at last realized that even a well-paying business is of no value if the whole country goes to smash. whole country goes to smash.

What Adams has so trenchantly pointed out to business men is true, of course, of all men occupying positions of authority and influence. It is true of labor leaders, of lawyers, si of financiers, of artists, of all who wield power in any form.

All are on trial today. All will be judged in the future by the degree to which they have served society in general.
