Japan and a Shooting War

Before the United States government is maneuvered into an Atlantic shooting war, it must decide how much it is willing to risk in the Pacific. Every major decision in foreign policy is a gamble, of course, but the uncertainty in the Pacific today is far greater than any ordinary hazard.

recurs (total) is far greater than any ordinary hazard.
Upon two things there is wide agreement. One is that the threat of a Pacific war is more real than it ever has been;
and that the immediate danger to the United States is closer in the Pacific than in the Atlantic—if for no other reason, because Russia and Britain are keeping Hitler busy for the ritiment at least. moment at least.

The other is that Hitler has been trying to precipitate American-Japanese war. That would be all profit and no s for Germany because it would force us to use for our own immediate defense most of the supplies now going to Britain and Russia for use against Hitler.

To these two generally accepted facts—the danger of Pencific war, and Hitler's effort to force it—must be added old Rule No. 1 in diplomatic and military policy: Never get caught in two wars (or on two fronts) at the same time, if you can help it.

No American who totals up those factors can consider the possibility of an Atlantic shooting war at this time with-out serious misgivings. Only those who forget or ignore Hitlet's partner. Japan, have the fantastic notion that American hets partner, apan, have the randaste month that while reas-shooting in the Atlantic involves no great risk to us; because we would meet only a few isolated Nazi submarines and raid-ers, while Russia and Britain kept Hitler busy.

The picture of Japan pouncing from behind, while we fought in the Atlantic, is so black that many persons are trying to wish it away. As part of this wishful thinking, it that the emperor personally has taken over control from the SOMETHING HE ATE nese agreement.

But until there is such a settlement, confirmed by acts, point starfish on your ninth birthday but until there is such a settlement, commind of the the United States cannot be drawn into an Atlantic shooting war without risking or even inviting an Axia attack in the Pacific.

Trying to wish it away. As part of this wishful thinking, it is said:

Japan would not dare fight the Anglo-American alliance, which would probably also include Russia.

Japan would break her pledge to fight with Germany, or interpret it away.

Japan has reversed her policy and is now pro-peace, as witness the Konoye overtures to the president and the fact with the contraction of a washing machine.

that the emperor personally has taken over control from the war lords.

The answer to all this is a great big maybe. It is true that Japan has made these gestures and wants us to believe them. But it is also true that if littler were dictating Tokyo moves, presumably he would follow precisely this iull-the-sickers-to-sleep strategy which tricked his European victims.

We don't charge that this is Japanese trickery. As the state department has observed of Japanese promises: Words hollonger count, only actions.

If Japan wants peace and is preparing for peace, why has she concentrated the largest forces in her history in offensive positions to attack Siberia, Singapore and Manila?

The president and Secretary Hull, in our opinion, have handled Japanese policy wisely and well, moving cautiously from conciliation to firm resistance. And we share the hope that success will crown their present sincere efforts for a Japanese agreement.

But it is also true that if little were dictating Tokyo and the force with him and tried in every way to a wind the single properties of the great of the day will he me it is entirely stated in to cry and spect on the force with him and tried in every way to a wind the size of the size
