New tankers on the job for you!

Built by Union Oil Company, they are releasing ships for the Battle of the Atlantic, and helping to reduce threatened gasoline shortage on the Coast.

Seven great new tankers like the Paul M. Gregg—built or being built by Union Oil Company—will help to lessen the threatened shortage of petroleum products in parts of the West.

The shortage, as you probably know, is not in gasoline and oil but in transportation facilities.

Because it is bulky and hard to store, gasoline must be kept moving... must flow from oil wells, to refineries, to service stations, to you.

The tankers have kept it moving. One ship carries as much gasoline as 400 railroad cars—eight 50-car trains. In normal times, these tankers carry the bulk of petroleum products between Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and Los Angeles.

Now there is a tanker shortage. As the war reduced Britain's tanker fleet, America came to her aid with ships from our oil companies.

The loss of these ships has seriously crippled Pacific Coast transportation facilities. In spite of valiant effort by the railroads and the trucking industry, the crying need is still for tankers.

Union Oil Company is bending every effort to meet this need—has been doing so, in fact, for the last two years.

At that time, when the war first began, Union had ten tankers, ample for its normal needs. But anticipating a future shortage, the Company, on its own initiative—without government subsidy—ordered 7 new ones.

Building huge ships like these takes time, but three of the seven have already been delivered. The other four will be launched at intervals of six months.

Each of them is big, fast and modern. Each can carry more than 100,000 barrels of cargo. Each contributes to the defense, to the productiveness, and to the comfort of our citizens.

They haven't cured the transportation shortage, but without them the problem would be a lot worse.

The Paul M. Gregg, pictured here at her launching, is the latest addition to Union Oil Company's tanker fleet. She arrives in Los Angeles this week to start service on Pacific Coast and help alleviate petroleum transportation shortage.

Union Oil Company launched the first oil tanker on the Pacific Coast some fifty years ago. We were proud of that first one. And we're proud of the latest ones, and the part they're playing in the present emergency.

There may be temporary shortages and inconveniences. But we want to assure you that Union is making every effort, night and day, to see that normal conditions are restored just as fast as human effort—and the Battle of the Atlantic—permit.
