Sea, Not Bomb Did This

Town Calls Volstead to Oust Saloon

GRANITE FALLS, Minn., Feb. 26. — (UP) — Andrew Volstead, "Father of Prohibition," has been asked to lead a court fight to prevent establishment of a saloon in his home town.

As a result of a peculiar set of circumstances, Granite Falls — has county seat of a dry county — has been granted permission by the state attorney general to turn wet. This, dry claim, is in direct contradiction to state local option laws.

The circumstances are these: The town is divided by the Minnesota river which forms the county line. Yellow Medicine county, of which Granite Falls is the county seat, voted dry at the last county option election. Chipewagon county, in which the eastern portion of the town falls, went wet.

The wet faction in the dry half of town thereupon petitioned State Attorney General J. A. A. Burnquist, asking exemption from the county option and requesting a special election to determine whether a municipal liquor store could be established. The election held in January approved the liquor store movement.

Results of the election, however, placed the town in the dry county in the position of operating, through its county seat, a liquor store in cooperation with a wet county. It also created a furor in the dry population of the town. Dry leaders in Yellow Medicine county have called on the aging former congressman, sponsor of the Volstead act, to "vindicate the sincerity of his prohibition stand" by heading an appeal to the state supreme court.
